INTRODUCTION

Government, industry, and labor representatives have consistently requested the Maritime Administration to revise its former publication Table of Maritime Collective Bargaining, emphasizing the importance of studying carefully current labor contracts before making decisions of policy or detailed determinations affecting maritime personnel.

Seafaring union activity in the United States maritime industry was first recorded in 1854, concurrent with the advent of steam-driven Great Lakes packets, when marine engineers formed a temporary local union in Buffalo, N.Y., to prevent a threatened wage cut. In 1875 the marine engineer officers organized their union on a national basis. The first unlicensed seamen's union began on the Great Lakes in 1863 and was known as the Seamen's Beneficial Union of Chicago, a mutual improvement society with no economic objectives.

The opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway may affect the pattern of wages and working conditions of seamen manning U.S. flag deep sea ships engaged in that trade. In order to understand the complicated labor-management background and existing conditions on the Great Lakes, it is essential to study this phase of ship operation. The most recent treatment of Great Lakes labor history is presented in a publication of Michigan State University.¹

Legislation enacted in 1884 permitted U. S. flag ships to sign-on low paid foreign crews at foreign ports. The competition of low-wage alien seamen and other factors, including long hours, abusive treatment, poor food, and quarters, and the practice of shanghaiing ships' crew members, spurred the founding of the Coast Seamen's Union in 1885. In 1891 its name was changed to The Sailors' Union of the Pacific. In 1892 the Atlantic Coast Seamen's Union was established, and the unlicensed seamen's unions subsequently merged to form the International Seamen's Union.

Interpretation and practical application of union contract provisions to matters of policy and everyday working problems requires a knowledge of the turbulent maritime labor history from 1900 through 1958. This period witnessed a series of eventful situations revolving around wages and working conditions and social and political issues. Various provisions incorporated in current agreements reflect historical labor-management differences relating to prevailing practices, rank and file pressures, intense union rivalry, mutual distrust, and the struggle for economic advantages. These problems ranged from individual operator bargaining to industry-wide negotiations concerning dry cargo and passenger ships (both subsidized and nonsubsidized), tankers, other special craft, tramps and industrial carriers. The collective bargaining agreements included in this publication cover coastwise, intercoastal, noncontiguous and foreign trades of the United States.

A study of seafaring labor relations reflects the trend toward maturity of unions and operators in their bargaining procedures, coordination of labor and management interests, and a significant approach to stable collective bargaining. The latest detailed accounting of deep sea maritime labor-management affairs was published by Harvard University Press.²

Of the 52,000 shipboard jobs manned by approximately 100,000 seamen available at the beginning of 1959, almost 47,000 jobs, or 90 percent, were covered by collective bargaining agreements between management firms or steamship companies and 13 principal maritime unions affiliated with the AFL/CIO. Slightly more than 5,000 jobs, or 10 percent, were covered by agreements with approximately fifteen independent associations.

The steamship firms identified on the following pages were responsible for the management and/or operation of 959 U.S. flag active merchant ships on January 1, 1959, consisting of 40 passenger and passenger-cargo combination ships, 598 dry cargo ships, 18 refrigerated ships, and 303 tankers.

This publication includes owners and operators of U.S. flag ships of 1,000 gross tons and over, type of operation, and seafaring unions that are parties to collective bargaining agreements. It also lists Government agencies and private associations concerned with the economic and general welfare of seamen.
